Doctor Cries Warning Against Butchery

If any public service corporation, for instance a telephone company, cut holes in as many beautiful shade trees on the public streets and lawns of our community as our specialists cut holes in the throats of helpless children there would be such a howl of protest as would awaken the laziest official from his civic sleep.

These were the startling words of warning uttered by Dr. Royal S. Copeland, of New York city, in a paper read before the American Institute of Homeopathy in warning against the wholesale removal of tonsils.

"What about these frequent tonsil operations?" he asks. "Are we making needless sacrifice of an imperfectly understood organ? Are we causing unnecessary human suffering? Are we surgically overzealous?" On the contrary, he is better, as contended by many really eminent authorities, to remove enlarged tonsils whenever they are met in early childhood, regardless of whether or not they bear any evidence of disease beyond their actual size. The chief argument of these medical advocates is that such tonsils are a constant menace and for safety's sake should be extirpated without delay.

"It is conceded without argument or discussion that cryptic, ragged, frequently inflamed and painful, obviously diseased organs are worse than useless. If such tonsils fail to yield to internal medication or local treatment they should be removed.

"With this qualification, however, I must put myself on record as being absolutely and unqualifiedly opposed to the ruthless operative adventures involved in a decision to operate simply because the tonsils are large. To extirpate these organs because of what may happen if they are left, to my mind, is as absurd as it would be to cut off the child's toes for fear he might some time have corns, or to remove one kidney to lessen his chances of nephritis.

"In each early morning's mail, as a member of the society for the advancement of clinical study in New York city, I receive a bulletin giving a list of the operations to be performed that day in all the leading
